"Race & Ethnicity in the Census: Past, Present and Future"

The US Census has recorded and tabulated data on race from its inception. The concepts and practices for measuring and reporting race data have evolved significantly over time and possible changes for the future are currently under consideration. Dr. Hogan is an expert on census practices and procedures relating to race. He will review these and related topics from over the history of the census to the present and give insights into the range of possible directions for the future.

Dr. Howard Hogan is the Chief Demographer of the US Census Bureau. During his career he has worked on four population censuses, population estimations and projections, as well as household and business surveys. He holds a Ph.D. from Princeton's Office of Population Research and a Masters of Public Affairs from the Woodrow Wilson School. He is an Honorary Fellow of the American Statistical Association.
